Brian's practice is premised on merging the future of communications with past successes and best practices. While counseling new entrants who aim to challenge the status quo in modern and innovative ways, Brian concurrently advises established service providers seeking to enter new lines of business utilizing these emerging technologies, yet still maintaining and modifying their more traditional offerings — such is the dual life of a communications lawyer who once upon a time alternated between playing a traditional tenor saxophone and a modern electronic synthesizer.

As a result, Brian's substantive experience encompasses some of the most salient communications policy issues of the day — whether it is cybersecurity, the regulatory treatment of IP-based video and other broadband services, or the implications of foreign investments in the U.S. At the same time, he is well versed in many traditional telecommunications and media regulatory issues that remain relevant even in an evolving marketplace.

These diverse client needs means Brian's practice takes various forms — from participating in rulemaking and adjudicatory proceedings before the FCC to representing clients at all levels of the federal courts and state public utility commissions. He also speaks and writes about communications law and policy issues in various arenas (but no longer performs on a saxophone or synthesizer).
